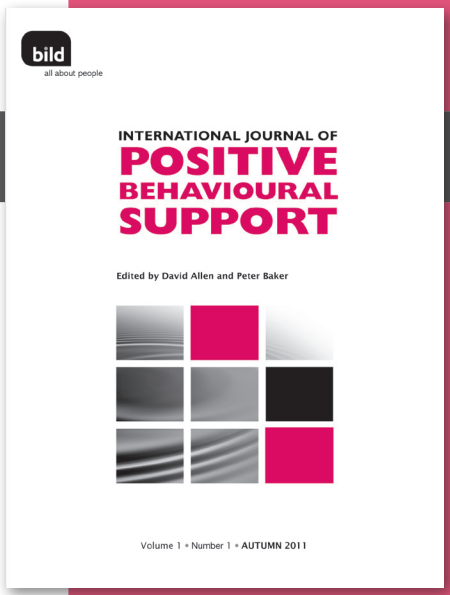
A new BILD Journal



The International Journal of Positive Behavioural Support

The International Journal of Positive Behavioural Support was launched in September 2011 and has got off to a flying start.

Positive behavioural support (PBS) combines the conceptual framework of applied behaviour analysis with the values base of social role valorisation and framework of person-centred approaches.

The International Journal of Positive Behavioural Support is a peer-reviewed publication that aims to:

- define and promote good practice in relation to the use of PBS
- add to the evidence base regarding such interventions
- demonstrate how PBS interventions can support people to change their challenging behaviours, improve their quality of life, and result in reductions in the use of restrictive procedures (such as physical intervention, seclusion and as required medication)
- bridge the gap between academic research and service practice

Articles published in the first issue:

- Positive behavioural support and the UNCRPD
- Assessing the effectiveness of positive behavioural support: The P-CPO Project
- Factors influencing quality of behaviour support plans and the impact of plan quality on restrictive intervention use
- Training family carers in reactive strategies within a PBS framework
- 'You squeal and squeal but they just hold you down'. Restrictive physical interventions and people with intellectual disabilities: service user views
