BILD PI Training Accreditation Scheme

Induction workshops

Overview

The BILD PI Training Accreditation Scheme focuses on universal elements of crisis management and supporting distressed people, and currently accredits 40 training programmes. Training around the use of physical interventions (PI) must be within a framework which underpins the reduction in the use of PI.

The Scheme is an evidence based process of external validation of the quality of physical intervention training programmes delivered to the health, social care and education sectors.

The fundamental process of accreditation is the provision of evidence that the applicant training organisation's curriculum and trainers comply with all of the criteria set out in the BILD Code of Practice (2014). It does not in any way endorse the techniques but focuses on the robustness of the risk assessment. Above all, the focus is on ethics, theory and values.

BILD accredited training programmes, and trainers are required to promote:

- best interests, human rights and quality of life
- an understanding that behaviour has a purpose and function
- a balance of proactive and preventive approaches to reduce reliance on restrictive practices, as well as reactive strategies and de-escalation techniques
- person-centred, individualised plans
- the use of data to ensure reduction of physical intervention over time
- supportive teamwork when working with behaviours of concern

- the importance of reflective practice, debrief and review
- the importance of handing over when stressed
- the importance of a bespoke approach to the inclusion of any physical skills

Adult health and social care commissioners, and learning disability and autism service providers make the BILD PI Training Accreditation Scheme a requirement when commissioning training services, and increasingly, children's services are requiring compliance with the Scheme also.

The BILD Code of Practice

Since first published in 2001, The BILD Code of Practice for the use and reduction of restrictive physical interventions has helped raise standards and change practice for commissioners, training organisations and trainers.

The fourth edition of the BILD Code of Practice is the result of ten year's work and continuous improvement. Though a voluntary code, the accreditation scheme it supports has played a real part in providing trainers, training organisations and commissioners of training with a set of standards, against which their services can be benchmarked and assessed.
