

Supporting individuals with self injurious behaviour

Conference:

11 February 2010 – BILD Offices, Kidderminster

Reducing restrictive practice and promoting positive support for people whose behaviour organisations find challenging

Supporting individuals with self injurious behaviour

Considerable study and research has been undertaken regarding the incidence of self injury amongst individuals with a learning disability. This mini conference will explore the relationship between the different functions served by such behaviour and appropriate support approaches with a view to separating fact from fiction.

Key themes such as functional analysis and emergent management methodologies discussed during the day.

There will be the opportunity to share issues, challenges and best practice to enable all delegates to develop their approaches knowledge.

Aims

- Establish the evidence base
- Review behaviour patterns of SIB
- Preview research evidence base on functions
- Examine effective supports to individuals with SIB

Who should attend

The day is aimed at practitioners, teachers, support workers, case managers and services managers who have a professional interest in supporting children, young people and adults across a variety of settings who are described as challenging and may exhibit self injurious behaviour.

BILD's quality commitment

- We are committed to promoting good practice in services through the provision of high quality and best value information and training.
- To enhance the learning experience and complement the learning materials, we will make relevant BILD publications available for purchase as part of the event.
- All our trainers are experienced practitioners and experts in their field of learning disability.
- Where possible, all our programmes will be mapped to knowledge requirements for NVQ Health and Social Care core or option units at Level 3.
